in the planning of the future of the open web. But how do you organize a roadmap planning process? In this post, we describe a common process, first drafted by Olin Shivers. ... When we began planning for a new release cycle last year, we already knew we wanted to have a vision for the next couple of years. Today, we are announcing our roadmap and we are looking for people to help make it a reality. ... The second day of our pre-release planning process included a lot of discussion about features that the team would like to build for the next two years. At the same time, the Firefox team has started looking into a new release cycle. ... If you've been following the Firefox roadmap planning process this week, you might have seen a lot of talk about "councils." We use councils to work on issues that have a high business impact or require collaboration with multiple other teams. ... We recently began a pre-release planning process to identify the direction that Firefox will take over the next couple of years. While the team has been working on this over the past few months, now is the time to begin bringing the roadmap to the public. ... As we all know, the Firefox development community is an amazing group of people, and we are fortunate to have a rich culture around ideas and planning. You also know that we sometimes need a place to talk about these things. That's why our development team started working on a roadmap. We want to collect what we believe are the high-level Firefox directions and use those to generate more detailed discussion about the future of Firefox. If you'd like to learn more, we recently posted a document detailing the process we 82157476af
